MORE than 600 of the American advertising men who went to London as delegates to the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World supplemented their journey to England with a trip across the Channel to France after the close of the convention and were amply rewarded by their reception in Paris. A three-day program of activities was arranged for them, numbering among its features a luncheon given by President Doumergue at the Elysée Palace, a visit to the Chateau of Versailles, and a round of fêtes and receptions, reaching its climax in a monster banquet at the Hotel Continental, attended by American, French and British diplomatic and commercial representatives, at which Premier Herriot presided and American Ambassador Myron T. Herrick was one of the guests of honor. The official program opened with a ceremonial visit by the delegates to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier under the Arc de Triomphe. Nearly 2,000 persons encircled the tomb after the American delegates had marched up the Champs Elysée to the sacred site and were received by Senator Dupuy, President of the French committee which entertained the visitors, and General Buhler, representing the French Minister of War. In the name of American advertising men Jesse H. Neal, General Secretary of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, laid a bronze sheaf on the tomb, and members of the delegation filed slowly past, many placing individual offerings of flowers beside the organization's tribute. In the afternoon the delegation was driven to the Chateau at Versailles, where, after a dinner served at long tables under the marble colonnade of the Grand Trianon, the French Government gave a fireworks display, for which the great basin with its illuminated fountains furnished the background. Visits, both formal and informal, occupied the time of the delegates during the rest of their stay in the French capital. Principal among the occasions was their reception by President Doumergue at the Elysée Palace after a luncheon given by the American Chamber of Commerce and a call on the municipal authorities.

(Times Wide World Photos.)

RECENT dispatches from Mexico City have told how young Mexico, in truly revolutionary style, is divided into hostile camps over the question of the fair señoritas bobbing their raven tresses and thus throwing another feminine tradition into the discard. When a few adventurous maidens had their hair cut several weeks ago some Mexican students and other defenders of things as they are in women's styles seized a number of bobbed-haired girls in the street and sheared off what had been left of their one-time "crowning glory." The Archbishop of Mexico also entered the fray with a statement denouncing the new fashion and asserting that the "pelonas," as the bobbed-haired girls are called, would not be admitted to the churches until their hair had grown again. But there was a quick reaction in favor of the "pelonas" (the word "pelona" really means a bald woman or a dull-witted one, but it has been stretched to cover the present emergency); a Bobbed Hair League was formed, already claiming 10,000 members of all social classes; some military students from Chapultepec marched on the preparatory medical school, the centre of the anti-bobbed hair movement, and attacked a number of the future Mexican doctors. In Tampico, however, a crowd on the beach tried to attack a couple of bobbed-haired girls, who escaped by swimming.

SUMMER and all-the-year-round residents of Southampton, the famous beach resort on the south shore of Long Island, were so appreciative when the English beauties of "André Charlot's Revue of 1924" left the Selwyn Theatre and came down to give a performance in the garden of the Parrish Art Museum that they paid about $12,000 for tickets, besides giving their visitors a pre-show entertainment. Among the society leaders and artists who acted as guides for the girls on the beach and at the clubhouse were Samuel L. Parrish, at whose home the performance was given; Colonel H. H. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Chandler Christy, Ethel Barrymore, Mrs. Finley Peter Dunne and John Drew. The production, which was given for the benefit of the Southampton Hospital, took place on a stage built in the open air against the museum building, and members of the company used the interior of the museum itself as a dressing room, making their changes of costume in the shadow of the replica of the Apollo Belvidere and other art treasures. In the finale of the performance Miss Gertrude Lawrence sang "Home, Sweet Home" as a tribute to the memory of John Howard Payne, its author, who lived, a century ago, a few miles from Southampton.

NYMPHS"

From the painting by Jean Baptiste Camille Corot (1796-1875), leading French landscapist of the Barbizon school, whose works have been called "painted music." He delighted in portraying nature in her more delicate and ethereal moods—the misty dawn, the shadowy dusk, the hazy springtime—and is at his best in subjects like the example here presented of joyous nymphs dancing in the dewy morning while the rising sun dispels the mists, lights the tremulous leaves bathed in the faintly stirring air and reveals nature quivering at the coming of the new day.

REPRESENTATIVES from all parts of the United States will attend the "Women for Congress" Election Conference to be held this week at Westport-on-Lake Champlain, N. Y., under the auspices of the National Woman's Party. As its name implies, the conference, the first of its kind, has been called to select prominent women as candidates for the House of Representatives at Washington, regardless of their political affiliations. The business sessions of the conference will take place Saturday morning and afternoon in the open air on the shores of Lake Champlain. Sunday morning will be devoted to a memorial service at the Lewis Church in honor of Inez Milholland, an ardent suffrage worker who died in 1916, followed by a pilgrimage to her grave on Mount Inez, near Meadowmount, the home of the Milholland family. The Pageant of Equal Rights, given Sunday afternoon, will be the culminating event of the conference. Staged on a gently rolling plain at the foot of a rock-studded slope which forms a natural amphitheatre, the constant progress of woman throughout the ages will be depicted. More than 1,000 participants from twenty towns of the vicinity will make up the chorus, banner-bearers and leaders of episodes. The pageant will start with Queen Ti of the early Egyptian period and present a biblical scene, Greek, Roman, Chinese, English and American episodes of historical significance, showing what each has contributed to the present status of woman. The Torch of Freedom will be passed from one to another until it reaches the final figure of Inez Milholland, who will light up the altar at which homage is paid to all these pioneers in woman's struggle for emancipation.
